However, if agriculture can be made more efficient, the amount of additional land needed could be much smaller. Large areas of the tropics, including most of Africa, have relatively inefficient agriculture dominated by smallholders who lack access to modern agricultural technologies 24, 25. Such farmers frequently have large 'yield gaps'—differences between their actual and potential ...

The concept of sustainability lies at the heart of the debates that currently exist over the use of the planet's natural resources, yet there is no consensus on its meaning despite its intuitive appeal (Park and Seaton, 1996). This paper focuses on sustainable agriculture, although there is still no consensus on this more specific aspect of sustainability.
